Tapping Into Old Faithful, Pt. 3

If you haven't been following your favorite smut column the last couple of weeks, you may want to turn the page and read Dan Savage instead, as we're going to skip any reviewing and continue our lesson in female ejaculation.

As such, we assume you've got your tools, trust, and emotional issues covered, hence it's now time to get down to business. We'll address females directly from here on...

First, place yourself in your most comfortable sexual space. This might be your bed room, spare guest room, or even your home office or car; wherever your sexual energies are fully present, make sure it's clean, arranged properly, and puts you mentally at ease. Then - and this is vital - gather a few towels or blankets you won't mind getting wet. In fact, you want a barrier upon which you could fully urinate and not care. You also want to be secure that said liquid won't soak through, so the more layers the better. There is a throe made by Liberator (www.oneupinnovations.com) called the Fascinator that we've raved about in the past which has a moisture barrier woven into the fabric to prevent wetness from getting through. We usually lay our Fascinator down, then add a towel on top for extra protection. Why such a fuss over protecting the sheets?

The answer gets straight to the heart of why most women don't ejaculate. Simply put, female ejaculation is very close in sensation to peeing. What you are supposed to do to achieve this type of magical orgasm is to disregard an entire lifetime of not urinating for any reason other than emptying your bladder. Instead, you must take a leap of faith, defy the "hold it in" directive, and let it go. Sometimes it will be a few drops, at other times it'll seem to explode in torrents; but just before that moment of truth, the urge to expel a golden shower will be difficult to overcome. Preparing properly for the worst case scenario - that you do indeed urinate - at least puts to rest the threat of ruining blankets, sheets, and - heaven forbid - your mattress. If all this seems too much of a hassle and/or you're still worried about errant fluids, there's always a nice hot bath (if you have a big enough tub).

Now, you should go to the bathroom and empty your bladder.

Once settled into your space, it's time to prepare your anatomy. If you have a willing partner, have him give you a relaxing massage, followed by some soft cunnilingus (uh, pussy licking for you less technical among us). The vaginal area should be nice and moist, so adding a few drops of good water-based lubricant might be appropriate. Once you are somewhat sexually charged, insert either fingers or a g-spot appropriate device and begin applying pressure to the inside wall of the vagina (the tummy side), just inside the opening. If using fingers you or your partner should feel a slightly bumpy area, and as pressure is put on the this spot, the bladder will begin to swell and the vaginal walls will clench around the fingers or toy in preparation for ejaculation. This is the perfect time to apply a bit of clitoral stimulation to help push past the urge to pee, so crank up the Pocket Rocket or bullet and hit the clit with moderate power. Once that need to expel reaches its zenith, explode forth and let the fluids loose!

Rest. Repeat.

As for the male side of the female ejaculation equation, you can easily enjoy the benefit of her release by inserting your penis in place of fingers or toys and removing it a split second before liftoff, then letting her love juices flow over, around, and under you in mutual satisfaction. If she happens to release in a fire hose-like surge, let it soak every square inch of your body possible in its warm wetness. The key is to embrace the messy side of sex and revel in the unexpected. In our household, even if it is urine that flows over us, we welcome it as we would any other sexual fluid or experience.

And then some...
